

Photosynthesis is the process by which plants use solar energy, water, and carbon dioxide to produce the simple sugar molecule glucose. Through a series of biochemical reactions, plants convert the energy from the sun into chemical energy, which is stored in the bonds of glucose molecules. Plants then use the glucose to fuel their own growth and development. Oxygen is released as a byproduct of the photosynthesis process.