

DNA rebasing is a process by which scientists adjust the base sequence of a DNA molecule. In this process, certain base pairs are replaced with different bases. This can allow scientists to make specific changes to a DNA sequence or to modify a DNA sequence for specific purposes. For example, DNA rebasing can be used to create recombinant DNA molecules used in genetic engineering. Additionally, the process can be used to correct genetic mutations or to restore a damaged DNA sequence.