Partial differential equations (PDEs) are equations that involve derivatives with respect to multiple variables. They can be used to model a wide variety of physical phenomena, such as heat transfer in a system, acoustic waves in a medium, and fluid flow in a pipe. PDEs are often classified according to the order of their highest derivative. Common examples of PDEs include the diffusion equation, the wave equation, and the Laplace equation.